Presentation Guidelines

The purpose of the Symposium is to stimulate communication and interaction between practitioners and users, foster an interest in, and development of quantitative analysis of national defense and national security. With that in mind, to present at the Symposium, a presenter simply needs the approved abstract, briefing slides, and distribution statement. If the presentation is deemed notable, you may be invited to compete for the Barchi Prize, at which time a written paper will be required.

In addition, work in progress research may be presented at the Symposium. Discussion of work in progress is an important part of the MORS working groups! This is a good opportunity to receive feedback from your peers regarding how your analysis is perceived and how it may be improved. In the past, the Air Force Institute of Technology and the Naval Postgraduate School have provided excellent papers built around interim results of a Master's Thesis or Doctoral Dissertation efforts.
